OUTDOOR CANNABIS: HARVESTING GUIDE

2

KRIS' PRO-TIP

BEWARE - If you're going to bring outdoor plants into your home after harvesting, you may also inadvertently bring bugs indoors. This can present a risk to all of the indoor plants that are growing in your home. Many choose to dry within their garage, controlling the climate with a dehumidifier and AC unit.

ARE YOU READY TO REAP WHAT YOU HAVE SOWN?

Outdoor cannabis is typically sown in late May/early June and harvested in late October. While, on paper, this seems straight-forward, outdoor cannabis gardens are at the mercy of nature. As such, outdoor harvests are often dependent upon weather. There are many weather-related phenomena that may curtail an outdoor grow cycle, such as diminished sunlight, cold and rainy weather, and freezing nights. In addition, larger outdoor cannabis plants are often harvested in stages -- the removal of the first harvest allows the secondary, smaller buds to receive more sunlight and increase in size.

Remember: it is best to stop fertilizing plants in the last two weeks or so, prior to harvest, in order to prevent a harsh taste and "nutrient residual" from overtaking your bud.

SMOKE SIGNALS: IT'S TIME TO HARVEST

- Trichomes and pistils are the best visual indicators of when to harvest as both change in color and shape as the plant matures. Use a Jeweler's Loupe to magnify and inspect trichomes on the flower site.
- Trichomes gradually change in color from clear to milky-white, and, lastly, amber, as the plant matures.
- Slender, white pistils change color and take on a brown or orange hue as the plant reaches maturity.
- Many growers harvest based upon the 30/70 rule - when 30% of the trichomes have turned amber and the remaining 70% are milky white.
- Harvest early in the morning, when cannabinoid content is at it's peak level.

HIGH AND DRY

- Once your trichomes have turned milky white/amber, you can chop your plants down - either one branch at a time or the whole plant at once. There is no better way than the other, it is all personal preference.
- Hang your plants upside down, in total darkness and cool temperatures - somewhere like your grow tent.
- Be sure to aim for your temperature and humidity to be around 60 degrees and 60%, for the best results.
- Plants can take 7-21 days to dry depending on their environment. The longer the dry, the better.
- Have fans circulating under plants - never directly blowing on the plants.
- When your flowers are ready to come down, you'll know because the branches will snap instead of tearing or peeling off.
- Begin the curing process in Mason jars or Grove bags. Leave in Grove bags for the entire process or use Mason jars and burp for 15 minutes/day, for the first month. Do this until your buds have cured and are the perfect consistency.
